The Kentucky Editors.

The Winchester people hailed with delight the visit of the Kentucky editors to their city. Their visit may be described as a social one, we were so charmed with their genial, pleasant and delightful manner that their departure was a source of regret to all.

An impression prevails that Kentucky editors are nothing more than a set of rogues, a set of scoundrels, a set of scoundrels, a set of scoundrels. If we take the meeting at Winchester this year as a typical one, we cannot imagine how much an impression ever originated. They were with us three days and nights, nearly two hundred strong, and in the whole time not a single member was intoxicated, and this notwithstanding the fact that the Kentucky Association is a set of scoundrels, a set of scoundrels, a set of scoundrels.
